Excerpt from Nyitso a Novel of West Africa It was mid-morning, a bright, cloudless morning, suffused with heat, but a pleasant heat that menaced but never consumed. A pallidly splendid sun moved majestically to the zenith of a pale blue, rain-washed sky, poised above a drenched green earth. Elsewhere, the time of the year was the close of the calendar half-year. Here it was the close of the third season, the third of the five seasons. The rains were drawing to a close. Ahead, on the eastern horizon, lay an opaque haze. It contained a threat which the late afternoon sun might bring to fulfilment, when the wide plains would crouch beneath the sudden onslaught of the rain. But now the plains were at peace and unafraid, glorious, green, sweeping plains, the short grass thick and vigorous. Noisy little watercourses chattered their way in brimming, important threads, forgetful that in the dry season they would shrink and dwindle into nothingness. Here and there were clusters of thorn bushes and twisted euphorbias, dwarfed beside the tall stateliness of borassus palms, foliage spread out luxuriantly against the background of pale sky. Somewhere away to the right, lost below the horizon, lay the sea, angry blue surf rearing up into white foam and thundering down upon long white beaches. Fringing the sea lay the lagoons, vast sheets of dimpling water, the shores surging with the busy life of fishermen. Other lagoons too, tiny and scarcely disturbed, lying bowered in fields of be, the tall, strong, thatching grass, or groves of fotigba, little, stunted trees, stems hard in defiance of the salt air, and tangled branches throwing off stiff leaves. On the left the horizon was close,...
