He re-draws the lineaments of the traditional picture, that he may bring it nearer to what he judges the unvarnished truth, making it here and there just a little different, and--though each alteration taken by itself may be slight--the total effect is profoundly transformed. A turn has been given to the kaleidoscope, and the pattern rearranges itself, so that we seem to be looking at a different scene. We wonder what has been taken out, and what has been added, though sometimes the only change is in perspective. As Rabindranath Tagore says about Memory painting pictures upon a canvas, it makes many a big thing small and many a small thing big. This somewhat arbitrary picking and choosing was beyond reproach in those short studies which Mr. Strachey collected...
